My dad isn’t the best person at explaining how he feels, yet I know that doesn't mean he doesn't care. He is one of the most prominent figures in my life that taught me how to love. He taught me how to overcome issues that come my way because that's life. When something bad happens no matter what you have to keep moving forward. At times it might seem like everyone around you is moving forward and leaving you behind but he taught me that when you feel that way is the time when you work even harder to catch up.He has helped me through so many things which he is unaware of. My dad has worked unbelievably hard his entire life for me,my sister, my mom himself, the people around him and the rest of my family.These things led me to believe he is the most selfless person I have ever met in my life.

My dad was born in Mexico or more specifically in Ocotlan, Jalisco. He had 12 siblings along with his mother and father. My dad grew up very poor and had to share everything and by the age of 10 he was working in a bakery as a delivery boy to help support his family. One thing I realized through my life is how appreciative my dad is of the small things he gets. Most things he would appreciate is what people along with myself generally view as an everyday thing. When I asked him why he has so much appreciation for small things he explained that when he was younger he would see something as small as soda and chips as a major treat. A few months ago I brought home a bag of Lays potato chips from school and I asked him if he wanted them, he immediately took them and ate them quickly and I messed with him and said “wow you really like these chips?”. He told me a story of when he and his brother Ricardo were younger, one of their more wealthy uncles, invited them to help out at a country club and they would get paid. They agreed because it was easy money, they worked for about 3 hours helping serve and they were paid a bit of money, yet along with the money they got a bottle of soda and a bag of lays chips. My dad and his brother were in shock that they got soda and chips and were beyond appreciative and my dad said it was one of the best things he ever tasted. For that reason it became his favorite kind of chip and everytime he has a bag it takes him back to that day.

All his life my dad has had to work for what he has and has never had an easy way out. Not only this but he constantly put others before himself. He has helped me and my family in every possible way, shape, and form. I believe the best part of all he does is how little he notices he's doing something nice. He just does, he doesn't expect in return. If you are a genuine person you don't expect things in return for being a good person, you are just good.He has taught me that nothing ever comes for free. You have to work for what you have if you want to make it. There is no easy way in life,if you want the results you inspire to reach, you must do it yourself. He taught me that we make our own paths. We make our own choices in life which will foreshadow our future. Going through life we make small decisions we forget about that we don't think will matter in the moment. Yet I was taught that every minor careless decision you make does affect you in the long run. We chose where we go, and we chose whether to quit or use what we have to move forward. My dad taught me that you can have absolutely nothing yet if you truly want something so bad for yourself you can take nothing and make it into something for yourself.

In conclusion,my dad has raised me to be the absolute best version of myself that I can. At times, like everyone else, he makes me mad especially when he has a temper but I realize he's just human like everyone else. We all get one life and we are all living for the first time. He taught me that it's okay to make mistakes and that if we didn't make mistakes we wouldn't be human. All of us are imperfect and it's okay to be that too. He taught me to be confident in what I do and to ignore people in life who try to discourage me. I love my dad so much and though at times I feel too vulnerable to express it out loud I do. He has taught me almost everything I know and I aspire to work as hard, love as much, and be as selfless as he is in my lifetime.
